If there are sometimes doubts concerning the future of our country, I'm happy to report that after spending a week at National 4-H Congress in Chicago with 1700 young people - forget it - it's in good hands. Naturally this was the "cream of the crop." They are intelligent, innovative achievers and strongly motivated. I considered it a privilege to be among them.

Tom Hall, General Manager, Virginia Dark Fired Tobacco Growers Marketing Association, tells me that some growers are apparently using rubber bands to tie bundles of tobacco. A Norwegian firm has returned a number of the bands that they found in their tobacco.

This practice can be very detrimental to our marketing efforts. Tobacco and rubber bands ground or cut together and used for smoking just don't mix.

So - - if you've been doing this, please stop the practice now!

* * *

The high moisture and high temperature of the fall has led to the problem of molding of tobacco. Following is an excerpt from material developed at the University of Kentucky on how to remove mold.

Mold on air-cured tobaccos is a problem for growers in certain years. Some mold can be seen on stems of cured leaf almost every year but this is no cause for alarm unless the mold spreads to the lamina of the leaf. This problem seems to have increased in recent years and has begun to cause severe financial losses to several growers in Western Kentucky and North Middle Tennessee.

Observations, with assistance from the Tobacco Grading Service, have revealed losses to farmers ranging from $5 to $16 per cwt. on molded tobaccos as compared to comparable grades free of mold. Some growers have resorted to use of several materials to "treat" molded tobaccos and many of them have rendered the leaf useless to the buyers. Bleaches, antifreeze, vinegar, ethyl acetate, and rubbing alcohol leave undesirable residues and/or affect further processing and should not be used.

Experiments using denatured ethyl alcohol (ethanol), methyl alcohol (methanol) and ethyl acetate have shown ethyl alcohol to be the most desirable material to use in spraying cured leaf to remove mold. Denatured ethyl alcohol is inexpensive. Twenty gallons will usually treat an acre of cured tobacco and the cost is less than $2 per gallon.

If mold is confined to the "tails" of the tobacco, effective spraying can be accomplished while the tobacco is hanging in the barn. Do not dilute the alcohol. Use a very fine mist spray. When the alcohol comes in contact with the mold, dehydration of the mold occurs and it disappears.

If the mold has spread over a large area of the cured plants, remove the tobacco from the tier rails on the sticks and spray both sides of the plant. The finer the spray mist, the better the coverage and the alcohol will be conserved. Remember that the alcohol spray must come in contact with the mold.

Spray equipment used during the tobacco growing season is usually satisfactory but semaller nozzles are needed.

Denatured ethyl alcohol leaves no objectionable residue and appears to have no significant effect on odor or fermentation of the leaf.

It is best to prevent mold, when possible and economically practical. In the barn, the use of heat to lower humidity and dry the tobacco will usually prevent molding. However, during periods of prolonged wet, humid weather, it is neither practical nor possible to provide sufficient heat to eliminate mold in many of our barns.

If tobacco is found to have mold on the leaf to the extent that it will not receive an acceptable grade on the sales floor it is recommended that denatured ethyl alcohol be used as a spray treatment before stripping the crop. Once the tobacco is tied into hands, it is much more difficult to do effective spraying and considerably more alcohol is required to do the job.

Zinnia 'Yellow Ruffles' Hybrid
All-America Silver Medal 1978

A rich yellow now joins the colors available in the Ruffles zinnia class. And such a joyous yellow: it seemingly captures the sunlight and radiates it to light up flower gardens! You'll find Yellow Ruffles especially effective when combined with blue salvia, ageratum or with other golden or yellow summer flowers such as marigolds.

Yellow Ruffles is a dual-purpose zinnia. Its many-branched stems produce dozens of blooms per plant; it plays second fiddle to no other summer flower for landscape brilliance. Yet is admirably suited to flower arrangements; the long, slender stems curve slightly and adapt gracefully to summer bouquets. Cut flowers will last for a week or more.

Use 'Yellow Ruffles' as a background flower; plants will reach 24 to 30 inches in height by late summer. Blossoms assume a deep beehive form at maturity and average almost 3 inches in diameter.
